E.

E, the second vowel, and the fifth letter, of the English Alphabet. Its long and natural sound in English, as in here, me, coincides with the sound of i in the Italian and French languages. It has a short sound, as in met, men; and the sound of a open or long, in prey, vein. As a final letter, it is generally quiescent; but it serves to lengthen the sound of the preceding vowel, or at least to indicate that the preceding vowel is to have its long sound, as in mane, cane, plume, which, without the final e, would be pronounced man, can, plum. After c and g, the final e serves to change these letters from hard to soft, or to indicate that c is to be pronounced as s, and g, as j. As a numeral, E stands for 250. In the calendar, it is the fifth of the dominical letters. As an abbreviation, it stands for East, as in charts; E. by S., East by South.

G.

G, the seventh letter and the fifth articulation of the English Alphabet, is derived to us, through the Latin and Greek, from the Assyrian languages. It has two sounds, one hard or close, as in gave; the other soft, like j or dzh, as in gem. It retains its hard sound in all cases, before a, o and u; but before e, i and y, its sound is hard or soft, as custom has dictated, and its different sounds are not reducible to rules. It is silent in some words; as, benign, condign.

As a numeral, G was anciently used to denote 400, and, with a dash over it, Ḡ, 40,000.—In music, it is the mark of the treble cliff; and, from its being placed at the head, or marking the first sound in Guido's scale, the whole scale took the name Gammut, from the Greek name of the letter.

H.

H is the eighth letter of the English Alphabet. It is not strictly a vowel, nor an articulation, but the mark of a stronger breathing than that which precedes the utterance of any other letter. It is pronounced with an expiration of breath, which, preceding a vowel, is perceptible by the ear at a considerable distance. Thus, harm and arm, hear and ear, heat and eat, are distinguished at almost any distance at which the voice can be heard. In English, h is sometimes mute, as in honor, honest; also when united with g, as in right, fight, brought. In which, what, who, whom, and some other words in which it follows w, it is pronounced before it, hwich, hwat, &c.

I.

I is the ninth letter, and the third vowel, of the English Alphabet. This vowel in French, and in most European languages, has the long fine sound which we express by e in me, or ee in seen, meek. This sound we retain in some foreign words which are naturalized in our language, as in machine, intrigue. But in most English words, this long sound is shortened, as in holiness, pity, gift.—The sound of i long, as in fine, kind, arise, is diphthongal.—This letter enters into several digraphs, as in fail, field, seize, feign, vein, friend; and with o in oil, join, coin, it helps to form a proper diphthong. No English word ends with i, but when the sound of the letter occurs at the end of a word, it is expressed by y.

As a numeral, I signifies one, and stands for as many units as it is repeated in times; as, II, two, III, three, &c. Among the ancient Romans, Iↀ stood for 500; CIↀ, for 1000; Iↀↀ, for 5000; CCIↀↀ, for 10,000; Iↀↀↀ, for 50,000; and CCCIↀↀↀ, for 100,000.

I, formerly prefixed to some English words, as in ibuilt, is a contraction of the Saxon prefix ge; and more generally this was written y.

In the plural, we use we, and us, which appear to be words radically distinct from I.

IM-PU-TRES'CI-BLE, a. [in, and L. putresco.] Not subject to putrefaction or corruption.

IN, a prefix, [L. in,] is used in composition as a particle of negation, like the English un, of which it seems to be a dialectical orthography; or it denotes within, into, or among, as in inbred, incase; or it serves only to augment or render emphatical the sense of the word to which it is prefixed, as in inclose, increase.—In, before l, is changed into il, as in illusion; and before r, into ir, as in irregular; and into im, before a labial, as in imbitter, immaterial, impatient.

IN, prep. [L. in; Gr. ἐν; Goth. and Sax. in; Fr. en; Sp. en; It. in; G. in, or ein; D. in; Dan. ind; Sw. in; W. yn.] In denotes present or inclosed, surrounded by limits; as, in a house. It denotes a state of being mixed; as, sugar in tea. It denotes present in any state; as, in sickness or health. It denotes present in time; as, in that hour or day. The uses of in, however, cannot, in all cases, be defined by equivalent words, except by explaining the phrase in which it is used; as, in fact; in reason, &c.—In the name is used in phrases of invoking, swearing, declaring, praying, &c.—In, in many cases, is equivalent to on.—In signifies by or through.—In that is sometimes equivalent to because.—In as much, seeing; seeing that; this being the fact; as, I will ride for health, inasmuch as I am infirm.—In is often used without the noun to which it properly belongs; as, I care not who is in, or who is out; that is, in office, or out of office.—To be or keep in with, to be close or near; as, keep the ship in with the land.
